Preface

The purpose of this publication is to provide some empirical evidence concerning changes in comparative advantage over time, in different countries and across a wide range of selected industries. Obtaining an accurate picture of such trends is, perhaps, the first step in clarifying some of the policy issues related to world trade and industrial restructuring.

This study is the first in a series of occasional statistical publications the United Nations Industrial Development Organization (UNIDO) intends to produce. The information used in the statistical tables here presented was all derived from the UNIDO data base. In turn, those data were compiled from an extensive set of data supplied by the United Nations Statistical Office, supplemented by additional information the UNIDO secretariat obtained from other organizations. The subject of this investigation—the changing pattern of comparative advantage—has important consequences for the industrial prospects of both the developing and the developed countries. It is hoped that such information will prove to be of use to both academics and government practitioners in forming their own judgements about the direction and magnitude of changes in comparative advantage in specific industries. As indicated below, the subject is a complex one that does not easily lend itself to quantitative measurement. It is, nevertheless, a field of inquiry that is extremely relevant to the development of world industry and to the recent spread of protectionist policies that threaten both industrial progress and the expansion of world trade in manufactures.

The study examines in part one the significance of shifts in comparative advantage and the empirical and methodological issues that were considered in the estimation process and then summarizes the results. Part two, the major part, consists of country or area tables. In view of the large volume of data presented as well as the variety of theoretical and practical issues involved, no attempt at generalization concerning specific industry patterns has been made. However, only a casual review of the country or area tables is sufficient to suggest that the basis for trade in manufactures is a dynamic one. Increasingly, trade in manufactures has come to depend on the production technologies available to industry and on the patterns of demand prevailing in the relevant markets, and thereby the significance of differences in national endowments of labour and capital has been diminished.

EXPLANATORY NOTES

References to dollars ($) are to United States dollars, unless otherwise stated.

Use of a hyphen between dates (e.g. 1976-1978) indicates the full period involved, including the beginning and end years.

Besides the common abbreviations, symbols and terms, the following have been used in this publication:

c.i.f.	cost, insurance, freight
f.o.b.	free on board
ISIC	International Standard Industrial Classification
MVA	manufacturing value added
n.e.s.	not elsewhere specified
NICs	newly industrializing countries
OECD	Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development
R + D	research and development
SITC	Standard International Trade Classification
$x \in S$	x is an element of the set S

The following should be noted in connection with the country or area tables:

(a) Export-performance indicators represent averages over the indicated periods. Only in some cases of poor data coverage, values of the indicators for single years replace the three-year averages or two-year averages usually given;

(b) A negative sign (-) of the net-exports percentage indicates a deficit of exports versus imports of the respective commodity group;

(c) Missing values of indicators or summary statistics are denoted by three dots (...);

(d) Measurement concepts are explained in chapter III, whereas data and computational procedures are described in chapter IV;

(e) Trade data for Belgium include Luxembourg; trade data for the United States include Puerto Rico;

(f) Use of a hyphen between SITC codes (011-013) means that both beginning and end codes are included;

(g) For reasons of space, decimal points in the codes have not been used. Thus code 2626 corresponds to 262.6; 0722/3 + 073 corresponds to 072.2, 072.3 and 073.

BACKGROUND

I. INDUSTRIAL RESTRUCTURING— THE SIGNIFICANCE OF SHIFTS IN COMPARATIVE ADVANTAGE

Between 1950 and 1970, the rate of world industrial growth exceeded that of any comparable period in the last century, this phenomenon, however, was largely confined to the developed countries. For example, in 1960 the developing countries' share of world manufacturing value added (MVA) was 8.2 per cent, while their share of world population was 57.4 per cent. By 1980, the corresponding figures of world MVA and population were 10.9 and 65.0 per cent. The share of the developing regions in world MVA in 1980 was distributed as follows (per cent): Africa, 1.0; Latin America, 6.1; and West, South and East Asia, 3.8.¹

The structural adaptability of the developed countries was thought to be a key element in their successful growth in the 1950s and 1960s. In recent years, this adaptability appears to have declined, jeopardizing the growth prospects of all countries. One of the explanations offered for this inflexibility is that adjustment pressures associated with international shifts in comparative advantage entail the contraction of some manufacturing branches in these countries and, as a consequence, are being resisted through policy measures. A thorough examination of this possible explanation would be extremely complex and involve a wide range of fields other than economics beyond the scope of this publication.

Changes in comparative advantage are closely linked to restructuring, understood here in an international rather than a national context. The concept is explained briefly below.

Economies are in a state of constant flux because of structural forces—technological advances, the accumulation of capital, the growth of skilled labour, changes in taste etc.—which may alter international patterns of comparative advantage. As a result, a country's ability to carry out various types of industrial activity efficiently can change over time. These changes have an uneven effect on industry in that a country may become more efficient in producing some manufactured products in place of others. As resources and other economic inputs are redirected to new activities, some industries are destined to contract in terms of their shares in production, employment, investment or exports. A contraction in one branch (e.g. textiles) is usually accompanied by a corresponding expansion elsewhere in manufacturing (e.g. electronics or capital goods) or in another sector of the economy (e.g. services).

¹A Statistical Review of the World Industrial Situation, 1980 (UNIDO/IS.214).

The pattern of structural change is similar among countries at comparable levels of development.² The contraction of an industrial branch is often common to several countries, and it may be preceded by a corresponding expansion of that branch in other countries. The difference in timing leads to over-capacities or imbalances in the demand and supply of labour and capital, which in turn cause problems of national adjustment. Hence, it would be erroneous to regard restructuring as a concept applicable only to an individual economy. It may involve developing countries at varying levels of income. It may also link the economies of developed and developing countries or even developing countries at different stages of industrialization. Clearly the concept embraces a broader range of issues than redeployment, i.e. the transfer of production capacity from the developed to the developing countries. Nor does it merely entail scaling down existing capacity in the sense that the term is used by many industrialists.

The ability of countries to restructure, which permits a greater degree of international specialization in production, was essential to the success achieved in the earlier years when the structural adaptability of the developed countries was, to cite a study by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD), "remarkable".³ To date, the international spread of industrial capacity has been largely confined to those countries, although the subsequent data show considerable changes in the developing countries' pattern of comparative advantage. Since 1950, new industrial capacity has been created at an extraordinary rate in both the centrally planned economies and the developing countries. Significantly, the process has not impaired the growth performance of countries that were already established industrial leaders. While their shares in world income or MVA have declined, their absolute and per capita growth has continued at a brisk pace. Although restructuring has not been free of costs to the established participants (i.e. today's developed countries), the potential gains have far outweighed such costs as retraining labour or scrapping obsolete capacity.

Instances of restructuring involving only developing countries are too isolated as yet to show an effect on trade, investment or the transfer of technology. However, if such a trend should emerge, it would boost trade among those countries, broaden their opportunities for technical co-operation and promote collective self-reliance. At present, the possibilities for restructuring are almost entirely contingent on structural adjustments linking the manufacturing sectors of the developing and the developed countries. Several developing countries have reached a level of industrial sophistication that would permit them to become full participants in the restructuring process, and others may soon attain this threshold. At the same time, many developed countries appear to have lost the inclination to continue to participate in restructuring. The ability of these countries to adapt to new patterns of competitiveness has diminished, at least temporarily.

The growth and restructuring of world industry has a cause-and-effect relationship with shifts in comparative advantage. Differential rates of structural change in the developed and the developing countries have accentuated these shifts. For example, in the case of labour, the developing countries have steadily enlarged their supply of skilled and semi-skilled labour. Gains in labour productivity have been fairly rapid as new production processes have been mastered. In the developed market economies, where skilled labour has long been abundant, gains in productivity have often lagged behind increases in real labour costs in recent years. Thus, for industrial activities with a high labour content, the competitive position of these economies has probably deteriorated by comparison with that of the developing countries.

²A study of the uniformity in patterns of structural change among countries has recently been carried out by UNIDO. See World Industry Since 1960: Progress and Prospects (United Nations publication, Sales No. E.79 II.B.3), chapter II and annex I.

³*Interfutures, Facing the Future: Mastering the Probable and Managing the Unpredictable* (Paris, OECD, 1979), p. 69.

Economists' thinking regarding the location of industrial capacity and determinants of trade between countries has come to incorporate the phenomenon of changes in comparative advantage. The rapidity and extent of changes in production processes, in types of products, in the location of production facilities and in the types of inputs required have altered economists' interpretation of the impact of trade on industrial restructuring. In particular, they now recognize that the interaction between determinants of comparative advantage is more complex than they had originally thought. Comparative advantage itself has come to be regarded as a constantly changing, or dynamic, concept.

Substantial shifts in comparative advantage may have many consequences. One of the most important of these is suggested by a question raised in a recent study: "In terms of technologies and factors, are the comparative advantages of the various economies, developed and developing, in the process of changing radically so as to generate considerable and differential pressure on the economic structures of the OECD countries?"⁴ The study answers the question essentially in the affirmative.

Most economic theory to do with the determinants of trade originally dwelt on a country's relative endowments of labour and capital. By definition, the developing countries had little accumulated capital. Apart from certain resource-based industries, their comparative advantage was thought to be in activities requiring large amounts of unskilled labour but sparing in their use of capital. An additional proviso was added as both economists and industrialists began to appreciate the importance of differences in the quality of labour. A country's endowment of human capital, i.e. the capital invested in education and labour training, was seen to influence trade patterns. Another refinement was introduced as it became clear that there was a fairly strong association between a country's share of world exports of certain products and the R + D intensity of those products. This led to the idea of a product cycle based on the premise that some goods passed through three production phases, described as "new", "growth" and "mature". The production of new products depended heavily on skilled personnel—scientists, engineers and skilled craftsmen. After these products had passed through a phase of rapid growth, they were thought to have reached maturity when their production required relatively low inputs of skilled labour.

Traditionally, the theory of international trade rested on the assumption that factors of production (such as labour and capital) were not mobile between countries or that their movements were so insignificant that a clear understanding of the trade process could be gained by referring only to a country's existing domestic supply of productive resources. The restructuring process has proved the need to modify this opinion. The conclusion of one economist that "the long-run effects of factor movements on development of industry in different countries and on trade between them can be very considerable"⁵ is typical of this change in view. Thus, economists' interpretation of comparative advantage and of the forces that determine it has been modified in two ways. First, explanations now take into account the role of human capital, R + D, technology transfer etc. Secondly, the significance of the international movement of these inputs and of unskilled labour and capital is now better appreciated.

In addition to general determinants of trade and the location of industrial capacity other, more specific, factors have also altered the comparative costs of producers in developing and developed countries. Among certain chemicals, the rising costs of raw materials and feedstocks have made production "feedstock intensive" rather than capital intensive.⁶ Future technological advances may again alter these relationships to favour new locations in developed countries, although at present this possibility is speculative. Continual competitive pressure in major consuming markets has forced most producers of standardized (or mature) electronic products to continue their search for ways to transfer parts of their operations to developing countries where costs are lower.

Such trends are tentative and do not suggest that the bulk of industrial activity will be transferred to developing countries. The developed countries will continue to account for an overwhelming share of world MVA for some time to come. The significance of these trends is that they demonstrate the dynamic nature of industrialization. By comparison with conditions in 1950, the present rapid growth of international flows—trade, investment, and technology—has accentuated the importance of international demand. Consequently, each country's competitive position relative to that of its trading partners has assumed additional importance and has become a major policy issue. Thus, the question of shifts in comparative advantages and comparative costs is central to the course of future industrial relations between the developing and the developed countries.

II. CHANGES IN EXPORT PERFORMANCE— AN OVERVIEW

Table I shows the exports of manufactures by the developed market economies and Yugoslavia in 1970 and in 1977. Only eight countries accounted for more than three quarters of those exports in both years. The Federal Republic of Germany replaced the United States as the largest exporter in the group, although the gains made by Japan were perhaps even more significant. Other studies have largely attributed the Japanese successes to a flexibility in export patterns.⁷

^bIncluding 42 developing countries for which data for both 1970 and 1977 were available.

Table 2 provides a comparable set of data for selected developing countries and areas. Again, a few countries accounted for the bulk of exports. In 1977, only 12 economies accounted for over three quarters of all the developing countries' exports of manufactures. A comparison with the percentages for 1970 suggests that the pattern of export concentration may have become more pronounced over time.⁸ The country rankings shown in table 2 also proved to be less stable than those observed for developed market economies. For example, in 1970, exports of manufactures by the Republic of Korea were the twelfth largest among the developing countries. By 1977, that country's exports were substantially greater than those of any other member of the economic group. Similar shifts in the rankings may be noted for Iran, Kuwait, the Netherlands Antilles and other countries that are major exporters of petroleum products (SITC 332).

Table 3 shows the major exporting industries included in the study and the composition of exports in three country groupings. Exports have been subdivided into resource-based and non-resource-based industries. Of the resource-based industries, trade in petroleum products (SITC 332) dominates the exports of each country group. Aside from this fact, however, the composition of exports by resource-based industries differs significantly between country groupings. Organic chemicals (SITC 512) are a major export of the developed market economies,⁹ followed by paper and paperboard (SITC 641) and meat and meat preparations (SITC 011-013). In addition to petroleum products, the newly industrializing countries (NICs) have specialized in exports of feeding-stuff for animals (SITC 081), meat and meat preparations (SITC 011-013) and fixed vegetable oils and fats (SITC 421, 422). Finally, for 53 developing countries other than the NICs, petroleum products accounted for 43 per cent of all exports by resource-based industries. Other important exports are copper (SITC 682) and sugar and honey and sugar preparations (SITC 061, 062). A general pattern is that exports of resource-based industries are most diversified in the developed market economies, somewhat less so in the NICs and are concentrated among selected products that typically require little industrial processing in developing countries other than the NICs.

The second half of table 3 provides a similar set of data concerning the exports of non-resource-based industries. Here, the predominance of the developed market economies is overwhelming. In 1977, the total value of this group's exports of non-resource-based manufactures was about 20 times greater than that of the NICs and 50 times the value of exports from developing countries other than the NICs.¹⁰

Road motor vehicles (SITC 732) are the major export of the developed market economies, accounting for 16 per cent of all non-resource-based industries. Non-electrical machinery (SITC 719) and ships and boats (SITC 735) follow in order of importance, although the share of these exports in the total is not substantial. Among the other country samples, differences in the export pattern of the NICs and other developing countries are, again, significant. The major exports of the NICs are, in order of importance: clothing (SITC 841), electrical machinery and apparatus (SITC 729) and telecommunications apparatus (SITC 724). Exports of clothing also dominate the pattern in other developing countries, followed by exports of two other related products: woven cotton fabrics (SITC 652) and textile yarn and thread (SITC 651).

If the examination of export patterns is carried out in more detail than the brief description provided here, the need to distinguish between industries that are not resource-based becomes more apparent. The arrangement of non-resource-based industries according to more detailed criteria draws upon the concept of the product cycle for its rationale. Two alternative interpretations of the product cycle may be found. According to one, an industry's revealed comparative advantage depends on its requirements for and the availability of skilled labour. Products requiring fairly large amounts of skilled labour are thought to be "new products" still in the early phase of their life cycle. Products requiring little skilled labour are described as "mature products" whose production utilizes many unskilled workers.¹¹ The alternative is to depict product development as a continuing process with "the rate of development determined by the condition that an acceleration of this rate would add more to costs than to revenue".¹² In this case, standardized products are indicated by a low rate of product development while unstandardized products are associated with a high rate. Unstandardized industries are not necessarily the same as new industries. For example, producers of office machines and scientific instruments incur large R + D expenditures, require large numbers of skilled workers and have high rates of product development. However, producers of plastic and rubber articles, soaps and cleansers have high rates of product development but require little skilled labour. Both types of products would be described as "unstandardized", although only the former would be "new products". The alternative interpretation associates export performance with producers' abilities (and inclinations) to alter their products' characteristics in response to demand or to achieve some degree of product differentiation. The first—conventional—interpretation of the product cycle was taken into account in drawing up table 4. The product-cycle classification of industries into "mature" and "new" industries was crossed with the familiar capital-labour-intensity criterion suggested by the factor proportions account of international trade.

¹⁰In comparison, the developed market economies' exports by resource-based industries were 12 times larger than those of the NICs and 5 times larger than the corresponding figure for other developing countries.

¹¹For a discussion, see S. Hirsch, "Hypotheses regarding trade between developing and industrial countries", in The International Division of Labour: Problems and Perspectives, H. Giersch, ed. (Tübingen, J. C. B. Mohr, 1974), pp. 65-82. An often-cited example of the product cycle is the development of the transistor radio. Initially, a large proportion of costs was in R + D, implying that the labour force was highly skilled. As the production process "matured", the operations became standardized and required far fewer skilled workers.

^aAll industries included in this study have been classified as resource-based, mature or new industries. For details on the methods of classification and the results, see World Industry . . . appendix to chapter II.

The results show that, on average, resource-based industries account for a declining proportion of total exports of manufactures at higher levels of development. These products continue to be important, however, accounting for over one quarter of the exports of developed market economies. For most developing countries (other than the NICs), resource-based exports provided more than three quarters of their exports of manufactures. In fact, the only major change in the percentages shown in table 4 was the decline in the share of resource-based exports by the NICs—from 43 per cent in 1969-1971 to 33 per cent in 1976-1978.

¹²J. M. Finger, "A new view of the product cycle theory", Weltwirtschaftliches Archiv, vol. 111 (1975), p. 86. Finger regards product development as a form of competition intended to retain old, and gain new, markets by offering for sale at established prices products that buyers regard as different from existing products.

Among the non-resource-based industries (i.e. those most closely identified with the product cycle), the reliance of the NICs on new, labour-intensive exports rose substantially along with a smaller increase in their exports of mature, capital-intensive products. Other trade shares were stable over time. The developed market economies relied heavily on the exports of new industries—products requiring large amounts of R + D and/or skilled labour—while the dependence of the NICs on mature industries employing relatively standardized production processes was apparent. Among developing countries other than the NICs, mature industries accounted for a small share of exports of manufactures, while the proportion supplied by new industries was negligible. The trade performance of this last group of countries depended predominantly on their export of resource-based products, a condition that remained unchanged throughout the 1970s.

Table 5 summarizes the changes in export performance in each of the three country groupings and for all non-resource-based industries included in the study. Export performance is measured by an industry's share in a given country's exports of manufactures relative to world exports of that industry as a share of world trade in manufactures. Thus, for example, an export-performance ratio of 2.0 indicates that the industry's share in the given country's exports of manufactures is twice the corresponding world total.¹³ Without exception, the ratios for the developed market economies exceeded unity. However, the ratios pertaining to this country group had declined by 1976-1978 for 47 of the 79 industries shown. As expected, the results obtained for developing countries show a much wider range of estimates. Among the NICs, 31 industries experienced a decline between 1969-1971 and 1976-1978. Large percentage increases in ratios may be seen in certain steel-producing industries, types of electrical machinery and transport equipment. Developing countries other than NICs revealed an even wider range of dispersion in measures of export performance. In part, this result reflects the very limited export base of many of these countries owing to their low levels of industrialization and their dependence on trade in resource-based products.

The dispersion of export-performance ratios mentioned above can be taken to indicate a country's diversification of exports of manufactures. A country with broadly diversified exports of manufactured goods can be expected to exhibit a narrow spectrum of export-performance ratios. The opposite should be true for a country with pronounced export concentration.

Table 6 provides some evidence on export diversification and its change over time. The dispersion of export performance—measured by the coefficient of variation of export-performance ratios—is smallest for the group of developed market economies, pointing to the highest degree of export diversification. Of the six largest exporters of manufactures, the Federal Republic of Germany leads also in terms of diversification, whereas Japan's export pattern shows the highest industry concentration. On average the exports of manufactures of NICs are more concentrated in certain industries than those of developed market economies but more diversified than those of other developing countries. Within both the NIC group and the group of other developing countries, however, a wide range of degrees of concentration of the export patterns of individual countries exists as can be seen from table 6. An almost uniform trend towards higher diversification of exports of manufactures in the 1970s can be observed for developed market economies and NICs. Among developing countries other than NICs cases of increasing diversification and of increasing concentration of export of manufactures can be found, while the group average of the degree of export diversification remained almost unchanged between 1969-1971 and 1976-1978.

III. MEASURING TRADE PERFORMANCE— ON THE EMPIRICAL ANALYSIS OF SHIFTS IN COMPARATIVE ADVANTAGE

The attempt to assess comparative advantage of trade in manufactures raises at least the following three questions:

- (a) How are manufactures to be defined in the framework of trade statistics?
- (b) Which empirical approach to the measurement of comparative advantage should be chosen?
- (c) How can indicators of comparative advantage be interpreted meaningfully?

Regarding the precise definition of manufactures in terms of the SITC, one of several possible versions has to be selected.¹⁴

Traditionally, the scope of manufacturing activities is described in the framework of production (ISIC) statistics. Accordingly, one criterion for selecting a statistical definition of trade in manufactures was that it should roughly match the range of activities commonly identified with the manufacturing sector. The choice had to be made from among at least seven definitions. These include (a) SITC 5-8; (b) SITC 5-8 less 68; (c) SITC 5-8 less 67 and 68; (d) a list of 76 specifically identified SITC codes; (e) a list of 45 specifically identified SITC codes; (f) a nomenclature arranging products into manufactures and semi-manufactures;¹⁵ and (g) a list of 145 specifically identified SITC 3-digit or 4-digit codes covering a wide range of processing stages of manufactured goods. The main difference between version (g), which was finally chosen in the present analysis as the definition of trade in manufactures shown in table 7, and others is that exports of resource-based industries with little value-added content are included here while they are often excluded from other studies. Since the data presented in this publication cover a broad spectrum of economies embracing many developing countries, it seemed desirable to include processed raw materials, which play an important part in the trade of these countries.

¹⁴The choice of a definition of trade in manufactures is quite important, since estimates of the value, volume and composition of exports of manufactures are sensitive to such a definition. See V. Prakash, "Measuring industrial exports: a comparative statistical study of variations arising from differences in definition", World Bank Staff Working Paper No. 225 (Washington D.C., IBRD, February 1976).

¹⁵Whereas definitions (a) and (b) are encountered in a variety of studies, examples of definitions (c) and (d) are found in UNCTAD, Handbook of International Trade and Development Statistics, various issues, and UNCTAD, Trade in Manufactures of Developing Countries, various issues. Definition (e) is taken from Standard International Trade Classification Revision 2 (United Nations publication, Sales No. E.75.XVII.6). For definition (f) see UNCTAD, "The definition of primary commodities, semi-manufactures and manufactures" (TD/B/C.2/3).

Note: The sum of the SITC categories shown in this table yields "trade in manufactures" as defined under (g) above. This definition draws upon the correspondence between the ISIC and the SITC as described in Classification of Commodities by Industrial Origin (United Nations publication, Sales No. E.71.XVII.15). SITC codes including a high proportion of primary items such as 025 (eggs) and 263 (cotton) were excluded from the detailed presentation by industry in the statistical tables as were categories representing trade in waste materials such as 231.4 (waste and scrap of unhardened rubber), 262.9 (waste of wool and other animal hair) and 267 (waste materials from textile fabrics).

In the analysis of comparative advantage, the concept of an "industry" was used for examining the structure of trade in manufactures at a disaggregate level. To account for diversity in market conditions and production processes, a specific definition was adopted that, in accordance with the majority of similar studies, associates "industry" with a three-digit SITC category.¹⁶ Only a few exceptions to this concept were made by including several four-digit SITC categories and by merging two or three SITC categories into one industry whenever it was deemed appropriate. This led to a breakdown of trade in manufactures into 129 commodity groups that can be taken as roughly representing industries.¹⁷

In the definitional framework explained above, several indicators of trade performance can be constructed that are supposed to describe patterns of comparative advantage within the manufacturing sector. One fundamental difficulty in finding an empirically relevant measure of comparative advantage is that "comparative advantage is usually specified with respect to pre-trade relative prices, whereas empirical researchers in international economics confront trade data generated by trade flows in post-trade equilibria".¹⁸ This difficulty led economists to introduce the notion of "revealed comparative advantage" on the basis of the assumption that the "commodity pattern of trade reflects relative costs as well as differences in non-price factors"¹⁹ such as differences in quality, goodwill and servicing. Previous studies have measured trade performance (and, hence, revealed comparative advantage) in two ways. One is to view revealed comparative advantage as being determined by the relation between an industry's exports and imports of the corresponding commodity group. Another approach is to treat an industry's export performance as an indicator of comparative advantage. In line with these suggestions the present publication shows the following three indicators of trade performance that can be associated with comparative advantage in manufacturing:

(a) A rough impression of a country's pattern of comparative advantage (or disadvantage) in manufacturing can be obtained from the distribution of exports of manufactures among commodity groups described by where X stands for the value of exports, i denotes a country, j a commodity group (or industry) and m total manufacturing:

(b) The relationship between exports and imports of each commodity group is taken into account by the second measure

$$nx_{ij} = [(X_{ij} - M_{ij})/(X_{ij} + M_{ij})] \cdot 100 \quad (\text{net exports as percentage of total trade}) \quad (2)$$

with M denoting import values. This term expresses net exports of a commodity group j as a percentage of total trade of this group for each country i , where a negative sign indicates net imports. The measure ranges between the two extreme values of -100 (characterizing commodities that were imported, but not exported) and $+100$ (for a commodity that was exported but not imported).

¹⁶See, for example, Bela Balassa, "Trade liberalization and revealed comparative advantage", Manchester School of Economic and Social Studies, vol. 33, No. 1 (1965), p. 104.

¹⁷For a description of these commodity groups see those country tables which show the full range of industries as, for example, the tables for France, Germany, Federal Republic of, or Italy.

¹⁸A. L. Hillman, "Observations on the relation between 'revealed comparative advantage' and comparative advantage as indicated by pre-trade relative prices" Weltwirtschaftliches Archiv, vol. 116 (1980), p. 315.

¹⁹Bela Balassa, loc. cit., p. 103.

The interpretation of (2) and of similar indicators, such as the export-import ratio, as measures of comparative advantage is subject to criticism, however, because import levels are greatly influenced by the system of protection used in a country. Thus, a measure of revealed comparative advantage involving both import and export data is likely to be biased away from the "underlying" comparative-advantage pattern of a country because of the above import policy effect.²⁰ Nevertheless, the net exports percentage (2) can shed some light on the trade performance of a country if it is seen in the context of other data shown in the present analysis. Furthermore, $|nx_{ij}|$ (the absolute value of the net exports percentage) represents the percentage of inter-industry trade in total trade of commodity group j for country i , whereas $100 - |nx_{ij}|$ is the corresponding percentage of intra-industry trade.²¹

(c) The most common type of measure of revealed comparative advantage found in the literature is an export-performance indicator free of the import-restriction bias mentioned above. The version chosen in the present case is where w denotes world totals.²² This measure represents the ratio between the share of country i in world exports of industry j and the corresponding share for total manufacturing, where a value of 1.0 indicates "normal" export performance of industry j relative to the size of country i as an exporter of manufactures. The export-performance ratio is usually taken as an indication of revealed comparative advantage or disadvantage in the export of certain products.²³

The selection of the trade-performance indicators listed above permits a country's trade pattern to be analysed in several stages by using increasingly refined tools. Details on the structure of exports in manufactures (measure s_{ij}) are complemented by information on net trade by industry (measure nx_{ij}), where for both indicators (s_{ij} and nx_{ij}) only trade data of one country are used. Finally, comparison of a country's exports of manufactures with corresponding ²⁰A more sophisticated measure of revealed comparative advantage—which suffers from the same bias as nx_{ij} —has been used in J. B. Donges and J. Riedel, "The expansion of manufactured exports in developing countries: an empirical assessment of supply and demand issues", Weltwirtschaftliches Archiv, vol. 113 (1977), pp. 68-72, in the form of where

$$\text{sgn}(a) = \begin{cases} -1 & a < 0 \\ 0 & \text{for } a = 0 \\ +1 & a > 0 \end{cases}$$

²¹For a discussion of inter-industry and intra-industry trade, see H. Grubel and P. J. Lloyd, Intra-industry Trade, The Theory and Measurement of International Trade in Differentiated Products (London, MacMillan Press, 1975).

²²See Bela Balassa, loc. cit. p. 106.

²³Further examples of the use of e_{ij} can be found in S. Hirsch, "Capital or technology? Confronting the neo-factor proportions and neo-technology accounts of international trade", Weltwirtschaftliches Archiv, vol. 110 (1974), pp. 535-563 and Bela Balassa, "The changing pattern of comparative advantage in manufactured goods", Review of Economics and Statistics, vol. 61, No. 2 (1979), pp. 259-266.

world totals leads to an assessment of the country's position in world trade and of its revealed comparative advantage for each industry (measure e_{ij}).

Three immediate ways of comparing indicators of export performance are to be seen from the layout of the country or area tables:

(a) For a particular country and a specific industry, an eventual change in export performance over the 1970s can be seen from the two values (for the beginning of the 1970s and the late 1970s) shown for each indicator:

(b) Within each table export performance can be compared between the various industries included;

(c) For a specific industry (commodity group) comparisons of export performance across countries can be made.

No serious problems should arise with intertemporal comparisons of indicators for individual countries and industries. If the required data were available, two three-year averages (1969-1971 and 1976-1978) were calculated for each trade-performance measure to correct for year-to-year fluctuations. When data coverage was poor, however, two-year averages or even single-year values had to be taken instead. The largest differences between values of the two periods shown would be expected with developing countries, where exports of a certain industry may have started in the 1970s or the available data describe export performance as being rather erratic. In such cases, only additional information about the countries and the industries in question can lead to a final evaluation of export performance.

When a country's export structure is examined by comparing the export performance of the various commodity groups, a typology of industries suggested by the theories of international trade can be helpful. It would be beyond the scope of the present study to introduce alternative classification schemes for industries as they are used in theoretical and empirical work on international trade.²⁴ What can be used as a framework for comparing export performance among industries, however, is the distinction between resource-based and non-resource-based industries. Following common practice, the group of resource-based industries was defined as comprising all industries from SITC sections 0-4 (including the food processing industries and petroleum products), SITC divisions 51 (organic and inorganic chemicals), 52 (mineral tar), 63 (wood and cork manufactures), 64 (paper), 68 (non-ferrous metals) and SITC group 561 (manufactured fertilizers). Extreme values of export-performance indicators are expected to be found frequently with resource-based industries, where they can be explained with the abundance (or, conversely, scarcity) of certain natural resources.

Furthermore, the degree of resource-dependence of an industry obviously plays an important role when export performance is compared among countries. The less resource-dependent an industry is, the easier it should be to compare its export performance among different countries. When such comparisons are made, possible distortions of measures (2) and (3) have to be kept in mind. The net exports percentage (2) is likely to reflect import restrictions employed by various countries as was mentioned above. Thus, intercountry comparisons of patterns of comparative advantage could, in many cases, suffer from a trade policy bias of measure (2). On the other hand, the export performance ratio (3) is dependent on a country's degree of diversification of exports of manufactures. Indicator (3) shows an upward bias in the case of a country with a high concentration of exports in a few industries, as can be seen from the definition of the export-performance ratio. Useful comparisons can, therefore, be made only between countries with similar degrees of export diversification.²⁵ In addition, information about broad characteristics of an economy such as per capita income, market size and the structure of production and trade—as indicated in the summary statistics portion of each table in part two—is supposed to provide the background of comparative analyses of export performance.

²⁴For an overview of the theoretical accounts of international trade and the corresponding relevant industry characteristics, see G. C. Hufbauer, "The impact of national characteristics and technology on the commodity composition of trade in manufactured goods" in The Technology Factor in International Trade, R. Vernon, ed. (New York, National Bureau of Economic Research, 1970).

^aThe codes in this column indicate a country's system of recording trade with the first code referring to imports and the second to exports. The meaning of the codes is as follows:

- G = General trade
- S = Special trade
- N = National trade

For a definition of the various systems of trade, see United Nations, Yearbook of International Trade Statistics, various issues.

It ranges between the values 0.028 (uniform distribution of exports among 129 industries) and 1 (concentration of exports in one industry).

IV. PATTERNS OF TRADE IN MANUFACTURES— THE DATA BACKGROUND

On the basis of the measurement concepts outlined in chapter III, detailed information on trade performance was compiled and is presented in the country or area tables in part two. The source for those tables is a set of commodity trade statistics supplied by the United Nations Statistical Office.²⁶ These data, stored on magnetic tapes, contain current values (in thousands of dollars) of annual imports c.i.f. and exports f.o.b. down to the level of SITC-items (i.e. 5-digit codes) for a varying number of countries and for the years 1962-1980. Trade flows are reported in terms of SITC, Rev.1²⁷ and correspond closely to the information published in *Commodity Trade Statistics*²⁸ for various years.

The broad objective of the present analysis was to derive indicators of performance in trade of manufactures in some detail by use of the above-mentioned data base. Under the data restrictions described below, such trade-performance measures were to be compiled for the beginning of the 1970s, and the latest available years by country and by industry, covering a fairly large number of countries and the maximum number of industries for each country. As far as possible, three-year averages of the various measures were to be shown in order to eliminate annual singularities in trade performance from the presentation. Data limitations and methodological considerations led to the selection of countries or areas and years shown in table 8, where 47 countries are listed for which trade-performance indicators were calculated according to the above-mentioned guidelines. A natural criterion for the inclusion of a country was the availability of trade data for at least part of the two periods 1969-1971 and 1976-1978. Unfortunately, none of the centrally planned economies met this condition with respect to the above-described data base. Countries with a negligible contribution to world exports of manufactures were excluded from the detailed presentation of export-performance indicators. Quite arbitrarily, the threshold value for inclusion of a country in the present analysis was taken to be a minimum contribution of 0.05 per cent to world exports of manufactures in 1977. A third criterion, on the basis of which various countries were excluded from the list of table 8, served the purpose of eliminating economies whose exports of manufactures consisted of essentially one (resource-based) commodity group. Thus, countries or areas having more than 75 per cent of their exports of manufactures over 1976-1978 concentrated in a single commodity group (industry) were dropped from the sample. Thereby Iran, Netherlands Antilles, Saudi Arabia, Trinidad and Tobago and Venezuela were excluded because more than three quarters of their exports of manufactures in 1976-1978 consisted of petroleum products. Similarly, Sri Lanka was eliminated because of tea exports accounting for the bulk of this country's exports of "manufactures". For the remaining countries, the degree of export concentration can be judged from the last two columns of table 8, which provides useful background information for cross-country comparisons.

After the sample of countries for which export performance should be analysed in detail had been determined, several decisions had to be made on the actual use of the available trade data. The central question in this respect was how to obtain consistent time series for the variables discussed in chapter I.I. In this context, consistency is understood as simply referring to a country's reporting (or not reporting) trade in a certain commodity over the years in question without raising the difficult question whether the reported values themselves are consistent. The data were thoroughly screened to explore the availability of both import and export data across countries, across industries and over the years selected for the present analysis. In the ideal case where all required data are available, the data base could be represented by two real-valued functions of the form

$$M: (i, j, t) \longrightarrow M(i, j, t) \quad (4a)$$

$$X: (i, j, t) \longrightarrow X(i, j, t) \quad (4b)$$

where M and X are import and export values, respectively, with (i, j, t) being a member of the set of subscripts S , which can be written as the Cartesian product

$$S = C \times I \times Y \quad (5)$$

In (5) C represents the set of the selected 47 countries, I the set of the considered 129 industries (commodity groups) and Y the set of the years 1969-1971, 1976-1978. If missing values exist in the data set considered, for at least one triple $(i, j, t) \in S$ function (4a) or function (4b) will not be defined. Data-screening procedures were applied to find subsets of the subscript set S on which the mapping (4a) and/or the mapping (4b) is defined for each subscript triple. Such restrictions of the above two functions had to be found in order to derive meaningful values of the trade-performance indicators (1) to (3) given in chapter III, as will be discussed below.

In a first step, the country subscript i was fixed, and for each possible combination of years $t \in Y$ that set of industries j was determined for which export values X_{ijt} were consistently reported. In selecting the years that were to be included in the final table for a particular country i , a compromise had to be found between the objective of showing indicators for as many industries as possible and the attempt to present average values of those indicators over two short periods. Table 8 lists the set of years chosen for each country on the basis of an informal procedure of maximizing the number of industries included in a country table under the above-mentioned averaging constraint. Indicator (1)—the share of an industry's exports in total exports of manufactures—could be readily computed for each country and for the industries and years thus selected.

A second step of data screening was necessary in order to obtain consistent data for the calculation of indicator (2), the net exports percentage. In analogy to step one, the availability of import data for a given country and its selected year-combination was explored across industries. Complementary to the criterion of consistent availability mentioned for export data above, consistent non-availability of import data for either the first (1969-1971) or the second (1976-1978) selected subperiod was taken to indicate zero-import values rather than missing values for the respective period. If import values M_{ijt} were available only for part of the chosen early or late years, indicator (2) was not calculated for that subperiod.

For the computation of comparable values of indicator (3)—the export-performance ratio or ratio of revealed comparative advantage—still another data-screening exercise had to be carried out. To make the definition of that indicator operational, e_{ij} was rewritten as

$$e_{ij} = \frac{X_{ij}}{\sum_{i \in C_j} X_{ij}} \bigg/ \frac{\sum_{r \in I_i} \sigma_r X_{ir}}{\sum_{u \in I'} \sum_{v \in C_u} \sigma_u X_{vu}} \quad (6)$$

The explanation of equation (6) is the following: the terms X_{wj} , X_{im} and X_{wm} of equation (3) have been expressed as aggregates of available data items; X_{wj} (world exports of industry j) is simply obtained by summing X_{ij} over $i \in C_j$, with C_j being the set of countries that reported exports of commodity group j consistently over 1969-1971 and 1976-1978. Both X_{im} and X_{wm} , however, were derived from the "high-aggregate version" of the definition of trade in manufactures that was used, as described in table 7. In the summation yielding X_{im} all those categories of table 7 were included for which exports by country i were consistently available throughout the set of years selected for table I_i for country i . The summand of each category r was multiplied by the sign σ_r derived from table 7 (i.e. by +1 for an SITC category included and by -1 for a commodity group explicitly excluded). Finally, X_{wm} (world exports of manufactures) were calculated in two steps. First, for each category found in table 7 (the high-aggregate SITC components of trade in manufactures) world exports were computed in the same way as the more disaggregate world totals X_{wj} described above, implying the use of different sets of countries (C_u) for the calculation of world totals of different SITC codes (u). Secondly, summation over all of table 7 categories (I')—taking into account the respective signs σ_u —yielded the desired form of "world exports of manufactures". The obvious reason for defining X_{wj} , X_{im} and X_{wm} as sums over restricted country samples and sets of SITC-codes is the goal of intertemporal comparability of the derived trade-performance indicators.²⁹

On the basis of the operational definitions of the indicators (1) to (3) for each country, values of s_{ij} , nx_{ij} and e_{ij} were computed for the years selected. Averaging of the indicators over the periods 1969-1971 and 1976-1978 (or subperiods thereof) was done by simply forming the arithmetic means of annual values.

²⁹In the formal data model described by (4a) and (4b), the data-selection procedure outlined above amounts to the use of appropriately defined restrictions of the M - and the X -functions for the computation of further functional values, i.e. the indicators (1)-(3).
